the ideology

The employability of today's engineers and architects is highly questionable. At the same time the construction industry is suffering from scarcity of skilled workforce. We, at Infini Institute, would like to train this unskilled workforce and bridge the skills gaps; in line with today's mechanised and intelligent construction industry's requirements.

To redefine education for employment, we adopted a unique pedagogy of experiential training instead of typical teaching. An integrated approach towards project management has been adopted to impart training of execution, planning, estimation, quality control, and tendering & contracting areas. Sound training of required software and soft skills along with corporate values is a part of this training. The best match between job responsibilities and necessary skill sets is ensured by personality testing and profiling. Learners are trained on-site to build the character.

“There is no job crisis,
there is skill crisis”

Industry today has a lot of people who are technically qualified. But the question remains 'are they employable?' Are they ready to accept and perform higher and challenging responsibilities? They would require training, orientation and maybe some increase in personal competency in a particular domain or field to suite changing demands.
